THE FRONT TIRES WILL BE ASYMMETRICAL, WITH REINFORCED
RUBBER

Along with Phillip Island in Australia, I consider the Sachsenring to be one of the two most difficult circuits of the season for tires. Apart from the fact that the riders drive it in an anti-clockwise direction, it is mainly the layout of the track that presents a challenge. Between turns 4 and 10, the Grand Prix bikes only turn to the left, which means that the right side of the tire loses temperature before entering turn 11, which is a sharp right-hand turn on a downhill section! This is a particularly tricky spot, where only tires designed for this specific task can deliver the required level of performance. We have a good knowledge of the track, which has enabled us to come up with a relevant technical solution for this type of situation, because it is precisely at this point that riders need to have a lot of confidence. As we do three times a season, the front tires will be asymmetrical, with reinforced rubber on the left side to compensate for the higher number of corners on that side. Conversely, the right side of the tire will feature a softer compound, capable of warming up quickly and maintaining stable performance over time. This consistency, and this 'à la carte' compound between the left and right sides, is the signature of Michelin Motorsport, which has always been able to provide our partners with the best tires in all circumstances.
